Plan Your COD MW4 DMZ FOB Upgrades with U4GM

_____

A good DMZ run starts with a route you can actually survive. Before heading into Hajin, pick an objective, check your equipment, and think about how you'll leave. Players browsing MW4 Bot Lobbies should still give movement and positioning their attention, because neither helps much without sensible decisions. Sprint across exposed ground when you've checked the route, then slow down near doorways and rooftops. Sliding or mantling can help you reach cover, but don't move just because you can. Keep your squad close enough to help without crowding the same doorway.

Give Every Return to Base a Purpose

Back at the Forward Operating Base, it's tempting to equip another weapon and jump straight into the next deployment. Take a minute first. Check your DMZ Orders, look through your stored supplies, and decide which station upgrade supports your next objective. The Operators Station handles your roster and Traits, while the Gunsmith helps you prepare weapons for the job ahead. Use the 3D Printer with a specific equipment need in mind. A useful upgrade should solve a problem you've encountered, such as limited preparation options, rather than simply give you another thing to unlock.

Build an Operator Around Your Usual Role

Operator progression gives you a reason to care about who makes it home. Dog Tags reflect each Active Duty Operator's development, and earned Trait Points let you shape their role through Warfighter, Scout, or Survivalist. Think about what you regularly do for the squad. If you're usually taking the first fight, combat improvements deserve attention. If you're checking routes or helping everyone survive a rough extraction, another tree may fit better. Don't spend points around an ideal version of your play style. Build around the decisions you actually make when things get messy.

Pack for the Objective You Picked

Loot space disappears quickly when you pick up everything. Before deploying, decide what you're trying to bring back and what you're willing to spend getting it. DMZ Orders and Dynamic Operations give your run direction, but adding every nearby objective can leave you short on supplies. Keep a few practical checks in mind.

Match your equipment to the mission.
Leave room for required items.
Agree on an extraction point early.
Reassess the route when supplies run low.

Know When the Run Has Done Enough

There's always another building to search. That's the decision that makes extraction difficult: leaving while there's still something tempting nearby. Once you've secured mission items or resources for a useful FOB upgrade, discuss leaving with your squad. Players considering whether to buy MW4 Bot Lobbies should keep their priorities clear and judge DMZ progress through completed objectives, surviving Operators, and equipment brought home. A short deployment that moves your plans forward can be more useful than a busy match that leaves you rebuilding your loadout.
